 in South East England*
 © Woodnet 2008

The market for logs is booming...on our centre pages we look at the state of the emerging woodfuel market and list some woodfuel related courses and events that are taking place in the New Year.

Welcome to the Winter Issue of WoodLots. We have been working behind the scenes to develop a new website for WoodNet and WoodLots, you can find further details and screenshots on page 4. The new one is an attempt to streamline and simplify the site and make it more accessible for the general public to use.

With this change we also need to reassess the funding for the printed magazine. Whilst we continue to believe it is a valuable resource in its own right it is becoming increasingly hard to secure funding to support its production and distribution. With that in mind we need to open a dialogue with our users to explore other means of funding the production costs. Although we are reluctant to introduce charging for line advertising or subscription this may be necessary to continue the printed version of the magazine. Options under consideration include:

- a subscription fee for all readers possibly with enhanced benefits and free access to place classified advertising.

- a higher fee or subscription charge solely for users who wish to place repeat classified adverts. An additional benefit for this could be to include company or business profiles of the advertisers within the website.

While we continue to explore the funding options we welcome your comments and hope to find a solution that both retains readers and allows the magazine to continue as a going concern.

RELAUNCH FOR THE WOODNET WEBSITE: www.woodnet.org.uk.

By the time this issue goes to press we should have our redesigned website up and running. Not only has the overall look of the website been substantially redesigned but the structure and navigation have been simplified.

Over the past ten years the focus of WoodLots has shifted slowly away from business-to-business advertising towards helping producers directly access and sell to the public. This shift is reflected in the design and functioning of the new website which aims to be much clearer and more accessible both to industry users and casual browsers alike.

Classified advertising on the site has now been replaced by a searchable directory which is linked directly to our database. This means that it is now much quicker for us to list and update line adverts. We can now place new adverts on the website between editions although at the moment these still need to be submitted via the standard WoodLots contact details:

woodlots@woodnet.org.uk

Courses and training events are now also listed clearly on the homepage along with a diary. With the flexibility the new site offers we will continue to improve and add features and articles over the coming months but hope you like what is already in place.

This Project received funding from SEEDA and the High Weald Sustainable Development Fund

Managing Woodlands for Biodiversity.

This is a four day course spread over a number of weekends in mid to late spring 2009. It is led by Dr. Patrick Roper, an East Sussex based consultant ecologist and biodiversity researcher with an in depth knowledge of our local woodlands and their ecological importance.

Sat 14 Mar '09

Managing Woodlands for Biodiversity: Woodland types

Ancient semi-natural woodland, secondary woodland, plantation, coppice, wood pasture, wooded heath...through the National Vegetation Classification system woodland has been categorised under many different headings. You will learn the relative importance of each and aspects of their conservation and management.

Sat 25 April '09 Managing Woodlands for Biodiversity: Fauna

You will learn about the animals, birds and invertebrates that make their homes in woodland during some or all of their lives and aspects of their identification and conservation.

Sat 9 May '09 Managing Woodlands for Biodiversity: Flora

You will learn which native trees and other plants are characteristic mainly or entirely of woodland with information on how to identify and conserve them. The day will also cover the growing problem of invasive alien species.

Sat 13 June '09

Managing Woodlands for Biodiversity: Management Planning

Virtually all British woods have been managed in one way or another over the centuries. You will learn the options and opportunities for today and some possible future directions.

This is a subsidised workshop with only 16 available places.

Advanced booking essential. Cost: £240 for the four day course-book now for 2008 prices.

Venue: Woodland Enterprise Centre, Hastings Road, Flimwell, East Sussex, TN5 7PR

Local Timber Producers Group Update.

With some development support from Leader+, Woodnet have initiated a local Timber Producer Group in East Sussex / West Kent to improve access to markets for smaller-scale timber growers and wood-processing contractors in this area.

The first meeting of the Woodnet Timber Producer Group took place on the 26th September at the Woodland Enterprise Centre, Flimwell, and was launched with two inspiring presentations with relevance to the Group.

Chris Yarrow from Wilderness Wood described how their woodland business had developed, and their experience of value-added processing and marketing they had undertaken from their 25ha. woodland site near Uckfield. Simon Bishop from Plumpton College then talked about a similar Producer Group model based around processing quality local meat at the nearby Netherfield Centre. Both were good examples of reaching the environmentally-aware buying public, seeking higher-value niche markets, rather than producing commodities in volume.

The discussions then considered the training needs for producers and woodland owners. This covered a wide range, from support for surveying woodland and identifying marketable produce, and then how best to prepare and sell products to the end user. From this exchange WoodNet is now planning courses tailored to these meet these requests, with a focus on adding-value and marketing your timber, and will be targeted at the specific requirements of members of the group who want to reach the buying public directly.

Producer Groups function best at a scale that allows these local relationships to develop, and the Woodnet Group in East Sussex will have to decide on how much further recruitment is necessary to sustain the critical mass necessary to provide continuity of supply. The membership of the group is not yet closed, so anyone in this part of the region who is keen to participate should contact Woodnet for further details.

Thermal Tree Assessment

Back in the dark ages of human medicine, doctors amputated limbs without pain relief and treated people using leeches. So the discoveries of anaesthesia and antibiotics were landmarks in medical history, revolutionising patient care.

Arboriculture is about to experience a similar revolution in professional tree care with the introduction of thermal imaging as a physiological assessment tool.

Thermal imaging technology provides arborists with the first ever positive, proactive tree assessment technique for really informed tree care.

THIS IS NOT JUST ANOTHER DECAY DETECTION DEVICE!

True tree care requires positive, responsible management practices that consider the reactive growth processes of trees and acknowledge that trees have an adaptive life cycle measured in decades and centuries.

Thermal imaging is an ideal tool for assessing the current physiological health of trees. It offers a combination of quick and easy data-recording and clear colour photographs that provide a visual interpretation of a tree's physiological function and enable the identification of decay and dysfunction.

Bat Surveys

Finding bat roosts in trees is a challenging task at the best of times and numerous experts have been thwarted, even when radio tracking tagged bats to a particular location. A tree may be considered to offer high value opportunities as roosting habitat, and bats have been observed foraging around its canopy, but it can still be a considerable challenge to confirm the presence or absence of a roost site.

The low light levels at dusk and dawn make visual observations difficult, and the pitch black of night prevent any accurate sightings. It is virtually impossible to tell whether a tree is a roost or just a foraging site. Thermal imaging overcomes these hurdles by transforming the heat generated by bats into visible images. Bats can then be observed leaving their tree roost sites and their activities recorded with still photographs or video images.

WOODFUEL

The recent resurgence of interest in woodfuel has been driven by two factors. As a renewable and potentially carbon neutral resource it has been supported strongly in the Governments sustainable energy policy. It has been calculated that there are currently up to 2 million tonnes a year of accessible biomass tied up in undermanaged woodland within the UK. (Source: FC Woodfuel Strategy) There has therefore been strong policy support at both local and central Government level for development of the supply chain infrastructure and larger scale woodfuel projects.

This policy support is slowly translating into an increase in demand. Julian Morgan-Jones from South East Wood Fuels (www.sewf.co.uk) reports the market for wood chip is steadily growing as more large and medium scale projects come on line. His company currently supplies 2000 tonnes per annum but anticipates this growing to over 5000 tonnes in the next year.

In the slightly longer term there is potential for much greater growth as projects work their way through their development and construction phases. If a couple of large scale biomass projects such as Combined Heat and Power Systems came on line it would have the potential to create a massive increase in demand for woodfuel.

On a consumer level the upswing in demand for woodfuel, whether it be woodchip or logs, seems to have been driven by price. The major increase in prices for traditional heating fuels such as oil and gas mean woodfuel has remained competitively priced in comparison. Increased haulage and processing costs have obviously led to minor increases in price whether that be for woodchip or logs but these are minor compared to the rises in conventional fuels costs.

The different strands within the woodfuel market could be seen to be diverging at present. The uptake of woodchip systems by public sector projects such as schools and hospitals are driven partly by emissions targets and continue to grow. However there is anecdotal evidence of a levelling off of interest in new systems from the commercial or private sector. Here high initial capital costs and increased price sensitivity since the economic downturn may have acted to suppress demand together with the fall in fossil fuel prices. During the recent peak in prices, payback on biomass systems fell to roughly 2-3 years from the more regular 6-7 years.. This reluctance may be short sighted given the potential for oil price volatility in the future.

At a smaller scale the demand from domestic users for more traditional woodfuel such as logs is booming and the demand for conventional woodstoves has been outstripping supply. This in turn has fed through into strong demand for seasoned cordwood with roadside prices starting to rise. Currently for the general public there seems to be continuing support for the existing technology and the lower capital cost of traditional systems. High equipment costs and the perceived unreliability of supply and quality are identified as a barrier to the uptake of modern woodfuel systems, this in turn has suppressed development of the supply chain. These are areas that are being addressed by organisations such as the Creative Environmental Network (www.cen.org.uk) in developing strategies to support the emerging woodfuel market. In the future there should be increased interest in the convenience and automation offered by newer technologies such as wood pellets, especially if the fuel prices themselves remain competitive.

WOODFUEL COURSES AND EVENTS.

Earth, Wind & Fire — Profiting from alternative energy

Workshop being held at the Woodland Enterprise Centre, Flimwell, East Sussex 28th Jan 2009

This workshop investigates techniques available to reduce costs and discuss the opportunities to become an energy provider. This session will cover many alternative suggestions on reducing current energy needs and the capture of waste power linked to individual energy audits. It will also discuss various methods of generating power for one's own use to selling to a third party with cost and payback indicators along with signposting to potential suppliers and sources of information. Nick Sandford, SEEDA biomass champion will also be joining us to share with us his own experiences of 'The Beautiful Fuel'.

All workshops are free of charge, 9.30am for refreshments and networking for workshop to commence at 10am concluding at 12.30 with a buffet lunch.

To book either call 0845 600 9 006 or visit www.ruralbookings.co.uk

The Sustainability Centre near East Meon in Hampshire is running a couple of industry based woodfuel courses In March 2009. The first is an Introduction to Woodfuel, led by John Bushby, who manages Wood4Heat, a subsidiary of Earthworks Trust. This is an ideal first course in woodfuel and focuses on the woodland resource and wood fuel opportunities for the forestry sector.

Sat 7th March 2009: Introduction to Wood Fuel

This course provides an overview for woodland managers, owners, building professionals and those who wish to understand more about the practicalities and benefits of using a wood fuel system. There will be a particular focus on the woodland resource and wood fuel opportunities for the forestry sector. Led by John Bushby from Wood4Heat

The second woodfuel course taking place is a 3 day intensive Ignite course run by the Rural Development Initiative. It is accredited by Lantra Awards, who provide a technical award in Woodfuel Production and Supply to those who complete it.

Tues 24th- Thurs 26th March 2009: Ignite Woodfuel Training.

Led by a Rural Development Initiative certified trainer This is the UK's only accredited woodfuel supply chain training course and provides a comprehensive introduction to woodfuel production and essential background to the market.
